The Man with the Compound Eyes by Wu Ming-Yi ...

In The Man with the Compound Eyes, Wu Ming-yi marries the gigantism of ecological collapse narratives with an informed awareness of environmental change as an intimate, local phenomenon. Despite the occasional imprecision (for examples, see notes 11, 12, and 15), Darryl Sterk's translation aptly renders both the intimacy and the lyricism of Wu's original.

The Man with the Compound Eyes is a compelling read until the final chapters when what is presumably intended as a climactic twist instead becomes the weakest part of the book, and the narrative spirals to a hasty and lacklustre conclusion that is somewhat out of sync with the pace and intensity of the rest of the book.

The Man with the Compound Eyes - Caixin Global

In The Man with the Compound Eyes, an ecological parable or eco-fantasy, he tells the story of a young Pacific islander, Atileie (Atile'i in the English translation), from the fictitious island of Wayo Wayo (suggesting Bora Bora) who arrives on the East Coast of Taiwan when the 'trash vortex', a floating mountain of trash which has formed out of the Great Pacific Trash Vortex, collides with the ...

Wu Ming-yi - Wikipedia

The Man with the Compound Eyes begins with a pretty bleak outlook for the first characters that are introduced. After a short, ominous chapter set in a cave, where everything goes black, the next two chapters describe the 'final day' of, in turn, the characters Atile'i and Alice Shih.
